Boundary Awareness & Selling Your Property:

The Importance of Boundaries in Selling Property
Your property boundaries are a crucial part of your transaction because they define the extent of the property you are selling. An factual statement of the lot size and dimensions is a good start, however being able to provide an accurate depiction of where your property officially ends, and your neighbour’s begins is equally important.

Isn’t that what my real estate agent does?
Yes, however ultimately the responsibility lies with you. Your agent can only disclose what you tell them about the property. Furthermore, if they don’t want to disclose certain boundary-related issues you tell them about, you can insist that they do. It’s your property and your sale.
Risks that Sellers Take
When you sell your property your main focus tends to be on getting the price and terms that you want. Most pay little attention to the risk of "trailing liabilities", issues that can crop up after the sale. Yes, your buyers now have possession, however they still have the ability to take legal action against you if they feel that you misrepresented the property or withheld important information.
Ensuring that your prospective buyers have all the information on your property before they bid is an important step in ensuring your sale goes smoothly and you avoid the risk of trailing liabilities.

What to Disclose?
The rule of thumb is the more you disclose, the less the buyer can pursue you for after the fact. Here is a list of items to make sure you know about your property and are disclosing in your listing"

BOUNDARYWISE Seller’s Report.
To avoid buyer’s remorse and potential legal action, make sure your agent has this BOUNDARYWISE Seller’s report. They can attach it to the listing, and/or make copies available at open houses and to serious bidders.

Easements.
Is your property subject to one or more easements? Easements affect the use of land and so to not disclose their existence opens you up to liability after the sale.

Encroachments.
Does your property have any structures (shed, deck, patio, wall, addition) that you know encroaches onto neighbouring land? Be safe. Disclose it in your listing.

Fences.
99% of fences in urban Ontario are NOT on the property line. And yet most people look at the back yard of a property they want to buy and assume the fences mark the boundaries. Always disclose what you believe to be the true location of the fences on your property. If you know they are off the property line – whether inside your property or over the line on your neighbour’s land – be sure to give that information to your agent.
Registered Plan of Subdivision.
Every property begins as a lot on a Plan of Subdivision. Plans of Subdivision are a type of land survey created by surveyors. They are commissioned for the purpose of obtaining planning permission to change the lot fabric of a piece of land (think turning a 40 acre piece of farmland into a subdivision with 150 residential lots in it). They depict the proposed lots, including location and dimensions as well as the proposed streets.

Providing a Survey Plan
A survey plan is possibly the most valuable defense you can provide against trailing liabilities. A survey plan, and specifically a Surveyor’s Real Property Report (also called a Building Location Survey, Plan of Survey and As-Built Survey) is a diagrammatical account of your property, it’s boundaries and all the structures and physical (man-made) features on the property. When you attach a survey of your property to the listing you are providing potential buyers a wealth of information that they can use in their due diligence. In doing so you are putting the onus of responsibility squarely on them.

Can I use an old Survey Plan?
Absolutely. If your property boundaries have not changed, and your building’s foundation is the same as when your old survey was created, then the old survey is a valuable tool to give the buyers the data they (and their surveyor) need to conduct boundary due diligence. Just be sure to state in the listing the date of the survey, and mention any structures on the original survey that have changed since then (such as fences being replaced).

Where do I find a Survey Plan of my property?
Right here at Protect Your Boundaries. In this Seller’s Report you’ll see a list of plans that we have in our system for your property (they are on the Property Page too). If we don’t have one that’s right for you we can do a Custom Search to see what we can find.
